Letter from the President

For nearly 50 years, NPF has been “making good journalists better” – and perhaps never has that taken on as much urgency as today. As newsroom pressures mount and budgets shrink, NPF provides no-cost, beat-specific training to journalists to enable them to report with more depth, context and sources at their fingertips.

If the biggest challenge facing journalists in 2024 was how to cover an election in the most polarized environment in our lifetimes, it would be more than enough. But add to that widespread layoffs in already decimated newsrooms; add the nearly 100 journalists killed and 400 imprisoned in 2023. The work journalists do is not merely challenging, it is life changing and, at times, life threatening.

Journalists need support. And it is the great honor and mission of the National Press Foundation to provide it.

As we face a defining year for our democracy, we thank the volunteers and donors who make it possible for hundreds of journalists to receive NPF training and mentorship every year. Each journalism fellowship and award propels new generations of journalists to serve the public and the truth.

With gratitude,

Anne Godlasky

President, National Press Foundation

Letter from the Chairman

As my tenure as Board Chair ends, I reflect on the past two years with a deep sense of pride and accomplishment. Our collective journey has underscored the vital importance of quality journalism, reinforcing our mission to train and inspire the next generation of media professionals. The National Press Foundation has remained steadfast in its commitment to these principles, navigating through challenges and emerging stronger.

I am particularly pleased to note the resumption of our annual NPF awards dinner (in-person!) over the last two years. The dinner not only celebrates journalistic excellence but also reinforces our shared commitment to a free and vibrant press. The successful return of this event symbolizes the resilience and enduring spirit of our community.

As I pass the baton to USA Today editor-in-chief Terence Samuel, the incoming Chairman, I am confident that the foundation is in capable hands. Under the leadership of Terry and Anne, I foresee a future filled with even greater achievements and continued growth. The National Press Foundation is poised to reach new heights, building on our solid legacy while innovating for an ever-evolving media environment.

Thank you to the many foundations, corporations and individuals who provide unwavering support to the National Press Foundation.

Warm regards,

Amos Snead

Chairman of the National Press Foundation Board of Directors

Journalism training is needed now more than ever

The National Press Foundation is heeding the call.

Employment at legacy news organizations is down two-thirds over the past 15 years. More than 1,000 digital newsrooms (non-profit and for-profit) have sprung up to fill some of the gaps. But both legacy and independent organizations share a common struggle: They lack resources for training their staff.

Democracy requires an independent, fact-based press to hold the powerful to account and give voice to the diversity of its communities. Research proves that local journalism leads to a more informed electorate and higher voter turnout – as well as less corruption, polarization and even loneliness.

Yet the journalists needed to perform this society-sustaining mission are too often overworked, underpaid and increasingly threatened.

Journalists are a megaphone to the world, but the demands of 24/7, multi-platform coverage put them under unprecedented pressure, compounded by mass layoffs in already lean newsrooms. The media corps is trending younger and expected to deliver more stories in less time. They face an assault of rapidly evolving misinformation, physical and online abuse, and general distrust. High-profile editors are walking away from their jobs, citing exhaustion. Few have the time or reserves to invest in reporters' training and growth.

A generation of newsroom decimation has made it harder for journalists to study a particular subject and learn from experts or peers on the beat. But this is precisely the moment when the public needs nuanced, in-depth and accurate reporting.

Against this challenging backdrop, the National Press Foundation remains committed to promoting journalistic excellence, which we pledge to do with increased agility. Leading journalists credit NPF fellowships and awards as pivotal to their careers, setting them on paths of success and better informing audiences across the country and around the world.

Our Mission

The National Press Foundation's mission is to make good journalists better.

Since 1976, NPF has educated journalists on the complex issues of the day. In the next three years, we will pursue this mission with two guiding factors:

2023-2027 Vision

Providing journalism training that is:

1

Broadly accessible

In the journalism training landscape, NPF stands apart by uniquely providing free, on-the-record training to journalists in the U.S. and abroad. It is how we live up to our values of transparency and accessibility. A journalist's or newsroom's financial situation will never be a barrier to getting an NPF education. Because we secure agreement from speakers in advance to record their briefings and NPF is in no way tuition-reliant, we can provide this content to other journalists and the public at large. From the expertise presented at a program, NPF produces a rich trove of content or "story kits" from each session, including key takeaways and pull quotes, videos, interactive transcripts, photos, speaker slides and bios, and additional resources. This creates a digital curriculum that extends the influence of every training beyond that of the fellowship cohort. Moving forward, NPF would like to further transform our training archives into MOOCs (massive open online courses) to become the "MasterClass" of journalism training – without the subscription fee.

Directly applicable

Because NPF training focuses on specific beats, from statehouse reporting to international trade to caregiving coverage, we provide for many fellows their first opportunity to brainstorm, debate and collaborate with other journalists on the same beat. In a few short days, the fellows form strong bonds, which we cultivate through various methods, including mentorships and curated WhatsApp groups, some of which remain active for years. Diving deep on specific topics, such as rare diseases, or specific skills, such data journalism, gives NPF journalism fellows tactics, lessons and story ideas they can employ immediately upon returning to their newsrooms.

Adapting to Newsroom Needs

NPF has decades' worth of detailed feedback from journalists about what works for them and what doesn't, which has helped NPF to design the intimate, impactful and engaging fellowships we offer today. NPF has been described as the "gold standard in journalism training" and our fellowships have been called "career-defining."

We select ambitious, multi-talented journalists representing diversity of all types (race, gender, age, sexual orientation, news medium, audience, location, experience level). The staff works deliberately to serve journalists of color and journalists from local and nonprofit news outlets. With those important demographics comprising the majority of our trainees, NPF is well positioned to train local journalists at a time when an influx of media funders are heavily focused on local news as a necessity of democracy. NPF staff, with roughly 100 years of combined newsroom experience, also heavily weigh journalists' application essays to determine who will benefit from the learning environment and go on to produce strong, relevant work. Our experience in blending fellowship cohorts has led to high participation rates, incisive questions, and mutuality in learning.

We have heard again and again how important and inspiring NPF workshops are, and the proof is in the stories the journalists produce afterward. Many journalists use the speakers and tools NPF introduces in future reporting.

We know what works – what's next is to help more journalists who need it. To achieve this, NPF will continue to invest in our online offerings through increased and improved multimedia efforts.

Our goal is to utilize our expanded capacity by repackaging NPF's existing (and future) media assets into new curricula.

NPF will develop content and curricula around four cornerstones: democracy, diversity, health and climate. These four topics represent areas in which NPF has earned the trust of journalists and sponsors alike through established training fellowships such as the Paul Miller, Widening the Pipeline, Rare Disease Coverage and Biomass and Climate Change programs. Education on these issues will remain urgently needed for years, increasing the likelihood that we'll have strong applicants, productive fellows and happy funders. As more newsrooms dedicate staff to these beats, NPF should be a top-of-mind resource.

While our primary funding is the generous sponsorship of philanthropic foundations and other organizations, we have renewed efforts to reach individual donors. In 2023, the NPF Board of Directors created an alumni outreach group to engage previous fellows, not only for financial support but mutually beneficial networking.

Every time "our" journalists list NPF fellowships on their bios and social media profiles, alert their fellows to a new job in their newsrooms or share with us when they get promoted, the NPF staff beams. That is what success looks like for the National Press Foundation.

What's Next?

NPF already punches above its weight, and it has huge potential to go further. The National Press Foundation's three-year strategy aims to expand how we help journalists and boost awareness of the important work we all do.

What Journalists Say

“This was a phenomenal training that I have not stopped talking about since returning from it. (I was even sending my editors stream-of-consciousness notes from the flight back!)”

Jenifer Gerson, The 19th
The Future of the American Child Fellowship

“These last three days have left me more inspired, empathetic and empowered. Coming here is this shared realization that all [newsrooms] face challenges and that we could all do better.”

Estelle Parsley, WRDW
Crime Coverage Summit

“The program was an incredible experience. I had the opportunity to network with talented journalists from all over Asia and their insights were invaluable. The speakers were all experts in their field, and the field trips were well-chosen. I learned so much from this program.”

Komeil Soheili, Yooran Film
International Trade Reporting Fellowship

“This was a great experience, and I can already tell how much this will deepen my reporting and help me prepare for the upcoming election. I also found so much of this program very inspiring and validating. It reminded me why I wanted to become a journalist in the first place.”

Lynn La, CalMatters
Statehouse Reporting Fellowship

“I appreciated the down-to-earth, realistic, and pragmatic perspectives presented by all the scientific experts. Their discussions went beyond pure science, delving into the tangible impact ... on the community.”

Siaw ChanChong, Malay Mail Online
Covering Rare Diseases Fellowship

“As we got more into the fellowship, I realized long-term care is everyone’s issue ... I’m really excited to bring this information back and package it in an accessible way for the communities I write for.”

American journalism is experiencing a severe and systemic diversity crisis, one that was foretold yet long ignored. There are simply not enough reporters and editors of color to inform, engage and accurately and fairly reflect our society.

Many newsrooms have tackled urgent social issues with majority white staffs—some more successfully than others. The National Press Foundation is addressing this problem through all-expenses-paid training and monthly virtual webinars to support journalists of color staying in – and leading – the newsrooms of tomorrow.

The first cohort of the Widening the Pipeline Fellowship launched in-person in D.C. March 2022 and completed in March 2023. The fellows said that the program sessions gave them a new take on their career paths and provided them with tools to reset and plan for new opportunities. During the year, seven of the fellows landed new jobs, and others said the advice from their program-assigned mentors helped them navigate career challenges or negotiate pay raises.

For more than 30 years, the Paul Miller Washington Reporting Fellowship has introduced rising Washington reporters to the city they have been assigned to cover. The fellowship gives print, online and broadcast journalists from top news organizations an intensive and lively overview of reporting in the capital.

The fellows met once a month to learn more about the Pentagon, the Supreme Court, the Capitol and other key Washington institutions. They reviewed politics and policy with regulators, lawmakers, experts and the best reporters in the business. And they networked with colleagues who help them grow personally and professionally.
